It was a moment of complete chaos and mayhem. Traffic gridlock in the city was such that it took fifteen minutes just to cross the road. When the lights turned red, cars and buses were packed to capacity with passengers desperately trying to exit before an already angry mob did something rash. It seemed like this situation could not get any worse than it did, until one lone man stepped out and began singing a song — something he had not done since he was a child — making all of life's troubles disappear in front of his eyes. This man was Zafar Khan (Ali Zafar), a small time conman from a small town in Pakistan. He was desperately trying to get his hands on the money that an American couple had conned out of him. Getting it back would be easy; he had already found them, but getting to the money before they did would be an entirely different story. A series of coincidences led him to adopt this town as his own, becoming something of a local hero, while searching for his long lost relatives. He was reunited with his father; who he thought was dead; and started looking after his younger brother. His father, Salim Khan (Shehryar Zaidi), was a struggling musician who had been trying to learn how to sing for years. He was disowned by his family and spent years trying to teach himself, but with no success. It is only after Zafar's arrival that he begins to realize his dream of becoming a singer. The movie ends with US couple getting arrested and Zafar coming back to the town along with his younger brother.

The film has a very critical reception. The Daily Mirror wrote a negative review for this film, writing that the film is "a thoroughly depressing tale of a man's descent into madness."
